I really admire the simplicity of this website. I find that with artist sites, it's best to keep it simple so that the viewer doesn't lose sight of the main purpose—to showcase the artist's work. I like the monochrome color palette, and for my website I'd like to emulate that.

Steffani is one of my professors at the moment. Again, what I like about it is its simplicity. However, I do appreciate the pops of color for the headers. I think that the homepage of this website is very aesthetically pleasing. I also really like how when you click on the actual work links, there's a description next to the image, which I think I'd like to do.

audience- I don't really have an intended audience, so I think I want to go in a direction that is visually pleasing to a broad range of people. I plan to do this by making it as bare and simplistic as possible, without unnecessary effects and glitz.
